In other words, we have implicitly assumed that the structural dimension of the human body (somatic) is responsible for pain and suffering, that it is what gives rise to the suffering. But is this so? If, for example, we imagine that all the painful suffering we experience is produced by the body, then we can assume that the body is the cause. But could it not be that the body is the effect, while the brain is the cause? After all, the brain controls the body. Here is an example: If I drink three glasses of water a day, the following will happen: If I drink only one glass of water a day, the following will happen: The water has to be in the stomach for a long time. It has to be digested. It has to be 82157476af
